But what about your own house? The costs of fire sprayers are potentially high, and systems involve considerable work to install. So you really need to do such lengths? According to the National Fire Protection Association, it makes sense to take additional measures to protect yourself, your family and your property. More Questions .net Are you tired of loading the hose from your garden or sprayer to make sure all parts of your landscape are well watered? The installation of the spraying system is a large DIY project. If you want to save on installation costs, keep water and spend less on irrigation, see this quick guide. How to decide if you need a spraying system before making this DIY project, helps to evaluate your needs. While having a spray system is convenient, it is a long project that will need to devote one or two weekends to complete, as Lowes pointed out. To decide if it is the best choice for you, ask yourself these questions: What kind of grass do you have? Cold season pastures such as bluegrass may need regular irrigation, while warm season grasses tolerant of drought such as buffalo lawn only need occasional irrigation, notes the extension of Colorado State University. What kind of soil do you have? The sandy soil absorbs water faster than the clay soil. It also requires more frequent irrigation depending on the extent of the Colorado State University. Would you benefit from automated irrigation? One of the greatest benefits of completing the spray system installation is that you can set your system for ideal frequency and irrigation depth. Before you start planning to install your spray system,with your local government to see if you will need a building permit. It also helps: check local and state regulations to make sure you can approach this as a DIY project. Some areas may installation by a licensed professional. Research the watering ordinances where you live. Check with local utility companies to identify areas where there are any underground lines. How to Determine the System Components You NeedBefore you buy any of the components, determine the backflow prevention type youeÁÁAre required to have based on local code. Other helpful things to know include: The size of your water meter or well pump The size of your water service line Your water flow rate calculated in gallons per minute The water pressure calculated in pounds per square inch To measure the pounds per square inch (PSI) of your water pressure and the gallons per minute (GPM), Popular Mechanics suggests picking up a pressure gauge to measure the pressure at your outdoor spigot. Use a simple five-gallon bucket to calculate how much your outdoor faucet puts out in a minute.Preparing Your Sprinkler Installation PlanCreate multiple watering zones, each with a separate control valve. Map out the property on graph paper, noting anywhere you have trees, shrubs, flower beds, mulched areas, slopes, sidewalks and buildings or fences. Plan to overlap the spray pattern from each sprinkler head to provide full coverage. Note where youeÁÁAll place the manifold near the water supply line.Sprinkler System Installation: The BasicsThe plans for sprinkler system installation are as follows: Run the pipes; placing them at least six inches deep, but preferably eight to 10 inches Assemble the zone valves above ground and cement them to the underground piping Install an inline drain fitting on each valveÁAs downstream side before connecting cable wires Install brass drain valves at every low point along the feed line and continue connecting and wiring all the valves before installing valve boxes and backfilling the excavated area Install sprinkler heads, tap into your homeeÁÁAs water line and install the backflow preventer and the sprinkler Control panel to finish things.
